Fall 2007

A JOURNAL OF WELL-BEING from MINDY McHUGH, RN, MFT RALPH BUTCHER, MFT www.ANewWayToLove.com

Life's Choices Aren't All Easy... But They Are All Yours

L ife is about making choices. Imagine bellying up to the counter at your local Ben & Jerry's ice cream shop and asking the server for "whatever flavor you think I'd like."

Of course you wouldn't do that. With a veritable rainbow of ice cream flavors tempting you, making a choice might be difficult, but you'd do it. "Give me Cherry Garcia and New York Super Fudge Chunk, put the chocolate on the bottom and get a scoop with lots of cherries in it for the top."

Granted not many of life's choices are as lightweight as choosing between chocolate and vanilla, but what you choose and how you make choices, or don't make them, is as central to your self-esteem as taking responsibility for yourself.

Choices come in two flavors: Active—when you make something happen and live with the consequences, and passive—when you "choose not to choose," and continue to live with the status quo because the stakes appear too high for any changes choice might bring.

Active choices can be painful; feelings of fear and vulnerability often accompany these decisions. Just because we know what's best for us doesn't make it any easier. This kind of choice-making is risky, too. The most difficult choices don't have any absolute right or wrong; there is no perfect solution. It takes great courage to face these hard decisions.

On the other hand, the postponement of choice can have serious backlashes in the way of stress, depression, discouragement, apathy, even physical illness. Procrastination seldom has any favorable results.

Though in the end the choice is yours, getting to the place to be able to make a decision doesn't have to be a solo trip. Ask for help. Talking things out with another person can be helpful, especially someone who is on your side but has nothing at stake in your decision.

Just putting voice to your concerns may help you sort things out, and writing down the pros and cons will give you more clarity than keeping everything in your head. Getting some distance (emotional or physical) may make assessment easier, especially if that distance allows you to see the reality of the situation, rather than the way you wish it could be.

Even with thoughtful consideration, not every choice will be the right one. But wrong decisions don't make you wrong. And, trite as it may sound, one of the ways we learn is through the mistakes we make.

Not each of the choices you make will have a profound effect on the whole of your life. But the ongoing and continuous act of making choices will.

Making choices you believe in, choosing intentionally and with moral deliberation, taking responsibility for your choices, these are some of the markers on the road of selfesteem. The way William James put it was, "The first act of freedom is to choose it."

Often, the things we say to ourselves we wouldn't think of saying to another person. We blame, shame, call names of the meanest sort, nag, belittle and bully ourselves through self-talk. What if, instead, we were gentler with ourselves, asked ourselves questions and listened to the responses? What if we treated ourselves as we treat a best friend, someone we love dearly? Here's a Top 10 list of loving things to say to yourself.

1. What do you feel? Listening for the response is like taking our emotional temperature.

2. What do you need? Pay attention to your needs, they're about caring for yourself.

3. Good job. Congratulate yourself on a job well done, whether it's mowing the lawn, writing a poem or cleaning the bathroom.

4. I apologize. Saying "sorry" for the wrongs we've done ourselves can be the first step in healing.

5. Let's play. Lighten up and have some fun. Listen to what comes up when you suggest play.

6. Breathe. Breathing helps relieve tension, gives us that moment we sometimes need to center and ground ourselves.

7. I forgive you. To have closure and to move on, we often need to forgive ourselves.

8. Let go. Release worries, resentments, anger and fears to make room for growth.

9. Be present. Staying aware of the moment keeps us feeling truly alive.

10. I love you. We say it to others, why not say it to ourselves? Say it again. *

A Welcome From

Mindy McHugh, MFT Ralph Butchen, MFT

This newsletter, like thousands of other publications appearing this fall, is focused on the holidays. While other journals and magazines feature gifts to give, goodies to bake, decorations to make or clothes to wear, Thriving focuses on the increased stress and anxiety, sometimes depression—that often results from the long holiday season...and what to do about it.

From Halloween to New Year's, the last quarter of the year can become a bumpy ride. Therefore, warning in advance, as well as helpful planning, will contribute to good self-care and well-remembered holidays.

Included in this issue is a feature about choice which is, according to Aaron Stern, "...the highest level of human functioning." Choice often comes either before or after worry, which is another featured story. You'll notice a similarity to some of the suggestions presented in each article.

This issue's quiz focuses on the skill of listening—how well you listen to others. You may learn something, too, about effective listening from the true/ false statements themselves. Hopefully you find it interesting and thoughtprovoking.

Please feel free to pass along this newsletter. For additional copies, or if you have questions about any of the articles, please don't hesitate to call.

All the best wishes for a joyous and peace-filled time.

Are You a Good Listener?

Good communication is a two-way street: speaking and listening. Listening doesn't mean just not speaking. To be an effective listener requires certain behaviors and attitudes. Listening is an action. Find out how well you listen by answering true or false to the following statements.

True False

- 1. Listening means paying attention. When I listen to someone, I look directly at him or her, and concentrate on hearing what he or she is saying. When I cannot give my full attention, I say saying something like, "Now's not a good time for me to talk about this, can we discuss it later?" then agree to a specific time to have the discussion.
- 2. Listening means accepting what the other person says. When I listen to someone, I withhold judgment and accept what he or she is saying "as is." I acknowledge what the person is saying without labeling it right or wrong, good or bad, true or false.
- ○ 3. Listening means being interested in what the other person says. When I listen to someone, I invite the speaker to give his or her opinion, say what's on his or her mind, or say how he or she feels about the topic or issue.
- S. Listening means being empathetic. When I listen to someone and I begin to feel defensive or impatient or angry, I try to put myself in the other person's shoes and appreciate what he or she might be going through.

- 9. Listening means paying attention to the whole message. When I listen to someone, I take in their non-verbal messages, too—facial expressions, gestures, eyes, tone of voice and posture because I understand these can contradict or confirm the words that are used.

Remember, just because we're born with ears, doesn't mean we start off life as good listeners. Becoming a good listener is a skill we learn, and like other skills, it takes practice to get better. Being a good listener is also a gift we can give to other people. Letting someone know he or she has really been heard is one of the finest things we can do for each other.

The Holidays: Here They Come, Ready or Not

When the weather changes and the leaves begin to wither, it starts. By Halloween, it's gathering momentum and by Thanksgiving, it has us in a full-body press. "It" is The Holidays, and whether you celebrate Hanukkah, Christmas, Kwanzaa or simply "the season," what everybody has in common this last quarter of the year is stress with a capital S.

No wonder. All those events and activities, family gatherings. The kids are out of school again, house guests are coming, or you're planning a trip. Don't even mention shopping for gifts, sending greeting cards or decorating the house. The credit cards are maxed out, you've got more chores than you can shake a stick at and your "to do" list is longer than Santa's beard.

And you swore it would all be different this year.

Take heart. It's not too late. With intention, it really can be different this year.

First thing to remember: take good care of yourself: Eat healthfully, get plenty of rest, exercise, drink lots of water. Breathe deeply. Relax and have fun.

During the holidays when already too-busy lives become even more hectic, some serious time management is in order. Write down a list of all the things you want to do. Prioritize. Assign some chores to the children. Consider scratching a few items off your list.

Make a budget and stick to it. Remember, it's not the price, but the thoughtfulness of the gift. Use gift certificates if you're unsure of what to give.

Remember, adults aren't the only ones who feel more stress during the holiday season. Children experience it, too. Keep communications lines open and spend quality time with your youngsters. This is a wonderful time to share your family's holiday traditions through storytelling or special seasonal activities.

Getting the young ones outside the house, for fullbody exercise will help them and you to work off stress. Go out and play together.

Having house guests? Try to make them as self-sufficient as possible. Ask for help. And even though it might be fun, don't wear yourself out by staying up late every night, or stuffing each day as full as a Christmas goose.

Family gatherings may be complex, given blended families and special holiday arrangements. Conflicting family expectations and demands can create guilt and resentment. If family gatherings cause tension and anxiety, consider alternatives that can lessen the effects. Make plans well enough in advance to avoid any last minute surprises or disappointments.

Finally, take time for yourself. Find a place where you can be quiet and restful. Take a walk, breathe in the fresh air. Look around you, notice nature's response to the season and let yourself be amazed.

Those Holiday Blues Are Real

It's not unusual to feel down during the holidays. In fact, so many people experience feelings of sadness or loss, of being overwhelmed at this time of year, even the name for it has become a cliché: the Holiday Blues.

As the name implies, these blues are seasonal. When the holidays are over, they'll probably disappear right along with the decorations and last of the Christmas cookies. But they are real and their symptoms can dampen an otherwise joyous holiday experience. Here are some symptoms and some solutions:

• Feelings of loss or separation from loved ones may be intensified during the holidays.

• Fatigue from holiday stress affects you emotionally as well as physically.

• Families and family traditions change. Are you hanging onto old ideas or pictures?

• Media images of the perfect holidays seldom match anyone's real life. Check your expectations against the reality of your situation.

• Over-indulging in food and drink will have aftereffects. So will lack of physical exercise, sleep and rest.

• If you're feeling "the blues," get support from friends and family. Don't isolate.

• These feelings are real and valid. Acknowledge them.

• Make time to refill yourself. Reconnect with your source through whatever spiritual practices you use.

• Understand that this is a stressful time. And that it will be over. Experiencing the holiday blues is part of the common experience.

Feelings beyond "the blues" and feelings that are more debilitating, or that extend beyond the holiday season, may signal depression. If this is true for you, don't hesitate to ask for help. *

Make Your Worrying Work for You

Worrying may have a bad rep, but worrying, if it's done right, can actually be helpful.

Effective worrying can anticipate—and avoid—problems, devise artful solutions and expand creative possibilities. It leads to constructive action. On the other hand, ineffective worrying is what keeps us awake at night, distracts us during the day and gives our physical systems a workout they don't need.

When you find yourself in bed at night, tossing and turning, plowing the same field again and again, you're in the midst of worry of the worst kind: self-perpetuating. The more you worry, the more stress chemicals feed back to the brain, telling it to worry more.

If you find yourself mired in this worry bog, try some of these actions to put your worries to work for you: • Get physical. Get up, move around. Action will temporarily relieve the worrying. When you come back to the problem, you may have a better perspective on it.

• Take a walk, work out, go for a bike ride or a run. Exercise increases blood flow, meaning more oxygen to the brain. Exercising regularly means you will probably worry less.

• Write down your worries in a journal. Simply writing your fears and concerns down takes some of the power out of them and gives you a sense of control. Writing your worries also gives you an opportunity to write possible solutions. Try this: write down the worry and, without thought to how workable or realistic the solutions are, write them down as fast as they come to mind. Don't stop to think, just write idea after idea. Given this creative outlet, the same brain that was nagging you with worries, can offer ingenious and often elegant solutions.

• Tell a friend. Ask for feedback, another perspective. Or someone to simply listen. Giving voice to your worries can take some of the wind out of their bedraggled sails.

• Make gratitude lists. Oprah Winfrey isn't the only one to recommend them. A gratitude list doesn't have to be long or well thought out. In your journal or on a sheet of paper, jot down several things you're grateful for. They don't have to be big deals the way the sun falls on the roses in the morning is just fine, if that's what you thought of.

It certainly is not as simple as the song, "Don't Worry, Be Happy," makes it sound, but somewhere underneath its whining, nagging voice, worry might have something important to tell you. *

Center for Creating Healthy Relationships

Mindy McHugh, RN, MFT Ralph Butcher, MFT

12 Crow Canyon Court, Suite 210 San Ramon, CA 94583

925.855.1320 925.855.1007

Ralph & Mindy are Certified Imago Therapists in private practice. They provide therapy to couples, individuals and groups. Specializing in Imago Relationship Therapy for couples, they offer a wide range of services, in addition to weekend communication workshops.

For more information on their practice and services, please see their website at www.ANewWayToLove.com.

The Purpose of Imago Therapy

• ...is to restore safety in relationships.

• ...is to transform destructive reactivity into purposeful expression.

• ...is to create the sacred space between so each is heard & individual needs are met.

• ...is to discover and reclaim the lost self to experience a fuller sense of wholeness, aliveness, & happiness.

• ...is to facilitate a move from the power struggle into healing love.

• ...is to offer Imago dialogue as a new way to express your love & appreciation, touching your partner's heart.

• ...is to help recreate fun, romance, passion & intimacy in long-term relationships.

"Getting the Love You Want" Couples Weekend Workshop

November 30, December 1, 2, 2007

Based on the bestseller of the same name by Harville Hendrix, as seen on "Oprah"

ANewWayToLove.com

Mindy McHugh, MFT Ralph Butcher, MFT Certified Imago Relationship Therapists

12 Crow Canyon Ct., Ste 210 • San Ramon Mindy 925-855-1320 Ralph 925.855.1007

